Shahnaz Husain: World's Greatest Woman Entrepreneur

There are perhaps few others who can stand testimony to the truth of these words, as Shahnaz Husain, India's pioneer in herbal cosmetics.

Credited with single-handedly placing Indian herbals on the world cosmetic map, her success story — that of young girl from a conservative Muslim family who rose to become an international trailblazer in the field of herbals — is by now legend.

President of CIDESCO, the first Asian to enter Selfridges in London and break a 40-year old sales record. GQM Commitment to Quality award, FICCI's outstanding woman entrepreneur, US magazine Success's "World's Greatest Woman Entrepreneur" — the list of accolades and achievements is endless.

An entrepreneur in the truest spirit of the word, the lady has a whopping 80 per cent of the domestic herbal market, and sales counters in the best stores internationally, be it the Seibu chain in Japan, Bloomingdales in the US, Galeries Lafayette in Paris, Harrods and Selfridges in London ... it goes on.

Meeting the high priestess of herbals in her office in Greater Kailash, one is struck by the fact that Shahnaz wears the accolades with the confidence of a person who deserves them — there is no self-effacing embarrassment when she discusses the more than humble beginnings of the Shahnaz Husain empire.

"Though I was married at a very young age, I always knew that I was made for something more," begins Shahnaz.

Not prepared to sit back as a housewife and mother at the age of 16, the young Shahnaz set about writing for magazines to earn money so that she could fund her education. Staying with husband Nasir in Tehran, Shahnaz found the ideal opportunity in the international beauty schools there. After studying cosmetic chemistry in international beauty schools in centres including London, Paris and Denmark for close to eight years, Husain hit upon the idea of exploring the 4,000-year-old Indian Ayurvedic system, so that she could research and develop herbal cures and treatments.

"I had seen the debilitating effects of synthetic cosmetics abroad; there was no doubt in my mind that the herbal system would work," recalls Shahnaz.

She returned to India to set up shop in one room, with a startup investment of Rs. 35,000, borrowed from her father. The going was tough — Shahnaz had priced her product well above the existing market.

"I began with just one product — Shalife, a massage cream. My facial were priced at Rs. 100, while you get one in the market for a paltry Rs. 6," reminisces Husain. However, that did not stop the crowds from coming in, and soon, Shahnaz had more than clients than she could handle.

The lady invented a marketing style uniquely her own; she decided to make the brand a personality-driven one, flying in to various cities to lecture on herbals and Ayurveda, inaugurating Shahnaz franchises and salons, and returning the same day.

"I would go to a place for one day, offer free prescriptions and advice, inaugurate the salon, and go back," says Shahnaz. It worked — today, there are more than 600 salons in India and abroad.

The Shahnaz Husain group of companies has acquired a global presence, with exports to 132 countries including those in the Middle East, South-East Asia, Australia and all over Europe. Recently, the company has been approached by a Fortune 500 investment company to explore business opportunities.

The strategy was one she applied with great success internationally as well — at one point, during a makeup demonstration in Russia, Shahnaz was asked to stop as the floor was caving in under the pressure of the people who had turned up to watch.

Interestingly, Shahnaz has never advertised her product, a fact that had Harvard in the US wanting to use her marketing system as a case study.

In retrospect, Shahnaz attributes her success to her "sheer grit and determination."

"I do not believe in destiny — the word "fail" does not exist in my dictionary. I never fail, because I never stopped trying," says she.

That she doesn't is obvious — 17 herbal lines, with many more in R&D, Husain is busy expanding her empire by adding health resorts, signature garments, accessory lines and more to her portfolio.

Having completed 25 years in the business, the self-taught marketing miracle reveals her formula for success. "In life, you get what you negotiate. Any woman has the capacity to do what I did — it doesn't matter what you want, what matters is how badly you want it."
